

Through his research, Miguel is trying to understand how our moral lives are being challenged by climate change and what moral resources we should cultivate to flourish in this context. His PhD project examines the worry that we might not be equipped with the right moral concepts to find a solution to Climate Change. Climate Change is often described as big and intimidating with some declaring that they do not know what they should do about it. This is an instance of moral disorientation: experiencing a serious disruption that obstructs our orientation towards a conception of the good. He argues that a richer understanding of the difficulties we face when thinking about Climate Change and how our thinking about it has been shaped by public discourse is needed to understand the anxiety and disorientation many people express.